the inaugural concert of the school's Sport and Art Museum and to observe local sports days, such as the All-Japanese Special Olympics, an event that attracted the attention of the Emperor. He also visited the various schools and factories of the city. In early 1950, while the Emperor was visiting Hōjūkō in the Aichi Prefecture, he was affected by the floods that had occurred earlier in the year. He donated 3.7 million yen (over 26,000 pounds sterling) to assist in relief efforts. Illness In 1951, the Emperor began to feel soreness in the skin of his nose. He made a trip to Nanjing in China in July of that year to attend the celebrations of the 40th anniversary of the establishment of the People's Republic of China, and upon returning to Tokyo, he was diagnosed with a medical condition which marked the onset of the middle stage of syphilis. He had, to that point, never engaged in any sexual contact and never had regular sexual relations with any woman. The Emperor refused to acknowledge the infection, however, and insisted on continuing with his schedule of public appearances and military exercises. This illness occasioned the first of several changes in the Imperial Household. It caused a reduction in the activities of the Imperial Household Agency (IHA), and it intensified concerns regarding the health of the Emperor's younger brother, Prince Akihito, then 17 years old, who would soon assume the position of Crown Prince upon the Emperor's death. According to one account, he had a crush on then-17-year-old Empress Nagako, who was eight years his senior, and that he regarded having syphilis as a symbol of rejection of his desires. On April 12, the Emperor's condition worsened, and he took a mild sedative to regain his composure. He continued working normally, and continued with the ceremonies that he had committed to, but he gradually became more withdrawn. In early June 1952, he underwent a series of medical examinations at the Sendai Imperial Hospital and was administered injections of a mercury preparation. He was reported to have shown symptoms of dehydration; according to one source, he had to be rehydrated with fluid through an intravenous drip. On June 13, he was transferred to the Teradome Imperial General Hospital in Tokyo; he was again administered an injection of a mercury preparation, and he received a final injection of prochlorperazine on June 17. Assessing the sustainability of land protection in urban regions of the USA using a biophysical agent-based model. A biophysical agent-based model was applied to the sustainability assessment of land protection in the EPA's central Florida Watershed. The goal of the investigation is to understand the dynamics of land protection over time, from the perspective of urban development in the region. Specific features of this particular region include the presence of two urban areas, the elevation of the region is generally below 500m, wet and dry climate, and the large size of the region relative to nearby smaller watersheds. The main question being asked in this investigation is: "What is the longest period of time that land protection can be accomplished in the central Florida Watershed before the impervious area will exceed the remaining available land protection area?" The model used in this study is spatially detailed with individual domains representing the region's City of Orlando and selected surrounding towns and counties. The model was calibrated against observations over the years 1999-2007, during which time the overall impervious area in the region increased by about 1%. Due to the size of the central Florida Watershed in relation to nearby smaller watersheds, the system was designed to provide a "snapshot" view of the system in a specific year; e.g., a consideration of a year prior is not always meaningful in this study. The analysis is based on the assumption that environmental agencies will focus on areas with highest rates of land protection in order to increase the probability of meeting the "800 year" land protection target. It was found that almost 70% of the land protection area could be accomplished at 100 years, and 82% of the land protection area could be accomplished at 200 years. The approach of understanding how land protection might be sustained in the central Florida Watershed over time could help guide environmental policy planning for this region.
