Q: How to use prolog for decidability? How to use prolog for decidability? I have found: A: When you talk about decidability, you make your first assumption that you are working with some sort of a formal logic system that has the ability to decide whether a given logical proposition is true or false. This is basically the decidability of logic: if you give a formal structure that has the ability to make a decision, the formal logic system can decide if the propositions are true or false (and nothing else). However, logic is not all about that. For instance, it can also be used to prove theorems. Here, the question is if a set of logical propositions, or a proof, can possibly be true. If this is the case, it is then decidable whether the set of propositions is true or not. You could also say that you are doing a proof. Hence, the word "decidable". So the question is if you can use logic to prove theorems. To see whether you can do this, you first need to check if the logic system you have at hand is sound (which means that if you prove something in it, you actually prove it in a way that it could possibly be true). If you then have a logic system that you know to be sound, you can then start proving theorems. If you cannot prove anything, you know the logic system is not sound. If you can, you have learned something about it! In short: If you want to make a decision (if it is a formal logic system), then you need to check if it is sound. If you want to do proofs in a formal logic system, you need to make sure it is sound. If you are satisfied with your proof, you have successfully proved something. NEWARK, N.J.
