What's new:

Immersion Chess is a chess variant invented by Max von Mazarin in the 1980s. It makes the assumptions that the pieces cannot move and that a piece captures pieces on either side (the variant additionally makes restrictions on king movement). Immersion chess is closely related to very fast chess (also called ultra-fast chess), a chess variant invented by R. Arnott in the 1970s. Immersion chess is a relatively recent development, being invented in 1987. Kings are considered to be their own pieces, unlike other chess variants that have the king always move as a separate piece. In Immersion Chess, the king is captured (invaded) if its checkmating pattern is triggered. This means that it cannot checkmate a kingless opponent by reaching the king. The king's checkmate pattern is a tree made out of smaller checkmate patterns, with the grand checkmate pattern being a square-square checkmate pattern. While played, some of the "regular" pieces are replaced with alien chess pieces that are portrayed to be different. It is not clear if these are only escorts and not majors, if they are both majors and escorts, or if they are neither. The king is sometimes replaced with an alien king that is portrayed by an alien creature instead of an alien knight. In the versions that have won official tournaments, major pieces can attack and checkmate without too much loss of tempo. The depiction of the alien pieces as being slower (but not necessarily weaker) than the standard chess pieces is an important part of the story of Immersion Chess. Chess game theory The game theory of Immersion Chess is very different from chess. The unusual rules allow players to use different game tactics at any time. Although the Immersion Chess piece array is a semi-impermanent board on which the game is played, no checkmate occurs in Immersion Chess. The game typically ends when one player makes a move that result in the win of the game. In Immersion Chess, each game is a single real, singular event that lasts for a finite length of time, like other chess variants where the movement of a piece does not affect the timing of the game. There are always zero or more chess tactics performed in an Immersion Chess game. This means that game theory is played out completely, in real time, at any time during the game. When one player's king reaches its own pawn, it
