Background ===== Calcifications in the spinal cord are usually secondary to trauma, malignancy or infection. They can be incidental findings in subgroup of young patients and also can mimic spinal cord neoplasms or tuberculomas \[[@B1]\]. We report a case of calcified spinal meningioma associated with Crohn disease. Case presentation ===== A 38 year old Irish Caucasian man was diagnosed as suffering from Crohn disease after presenting with chronic abdominal pain and intermittent diarrhoea. He had been on regular steroids. His symptoms included dysmobility, burning micturition and an ever-increasing abdominal girth. He had been investigated and treated in several English centres before being referred to our centre. He had sustained a previous acute myeloid leukaemia at the age of 3 years. He had been known to us for 3 years with clinical features of irritable bowel syndrome, but had been misdiagnosed as hypertensive. During this presentation, which was his second one, he complained of low back pain. On examination, he was found to be hypertensive (160/100 mmHg) but fit and well, with no evidence of chronic renal impairment. Magnetic resonance imaging 1cdb3666d
