mama dinosaur I have been thinking about motherhood and its implications for work (or the lack thereof). About six months ago I stopped staying up until 11:00 p.m. with my daughter. I no longer get up at 4:30 a.m. to go to work. I wake up, I make myself a cup of tea, I tend to the house. I then go back to bed. I don't have to rush to the computer in the morning, I can just get up. Also, my wife's in-laws are staying with us for a bit. We can both sleep in the one-room basement apartment that we've converted into a children's room with twin-size beds. Our daughter is sleeping now (a few hours). I could get up with her, but I'd rather sleep until after the in-laws go home. As a result, I am here now, rather than at 6:00 a.m., mentally prepared to go back to work. I'm not saying that I'm not working at all. I'm working on a couple of articles. I'm reading a book. I'm writing a play. I'm sharing my experience and experiences with others. I do some things for a local animation company and for a music studio. I've said that I wanted to do an art journal for years. I'm not going to lie – I don't do much art journaling these days. It's been fun. But the frame is filling up with nonsense. I have at least 30 views of the Ampersand, which I'll hopefully share here soon. I have just a few pages of random thoughts, word documents, photos, and so forth. I don't have many props. It seems that I have left something behind, though – mama dinosaur. I've been playing with a drawing I did on a piece of note paper, and it got me thinking about motherhood. Here's my drawing: Now this is just a bit of scribblings, it does not even begin to capture what my mama dinosaur was and still is. She was incredibly imperfect, and she showed me how to be imperfect. What a gift, what a treasure. When I was writing my novel, "The Mommy Moment"
