Heterozygosity of a TA repeat in the regulatory region of chicken amelogenin gene. Amelogenin, a major constituent of the extracellular matrix of ameloblasts, is expressed during tooth formation and maturation in a spatiotemporal pattern. In species where amelogenin is expressed, the amelogenin gene has been mapped to a single tandemly arrayed gene. Analysis of the chicken genome database revealed the presence of at least 10 genes that have high sequence similarity to mammalian amelogenin. By using PCR-based methods, including single-strand conformation polymorphism (SSCP) and denaturing gradient gel electrophoresis (DGGE), two alleles of chicken amelogenin, amel1 and amel2, were found to be genetically heterozygous in the gDNA samples from different chicken strains, in which the amelogenin gene is mapped to chromosome 28. To characterize the DNA polymorphism responsible for the expression of amel1 and amel2, the 5'-flanking region of the amelogenin gene was studied. Seven TA repeat sequences with a size range of 20-74 bp were found in this region, which showed strong sequence similarities to those of the human and rat amelogenin genes. DNA-RNA blot analysis also revealed two classes of amelogenin mRNA in chicken gDNA. The genomic homology of the chicken amelogenin gene with the human and rat amelogenin genes suggests that the heterozygous expression of amelogenin in the chicken may be important in the control of dentinogenesis.

Childhood and adult kidney disease. The prevalence of kidney disease has long been recognized as being significantly greater in childhood than in adulthood. The pathogenesis, clinical course and treatment of pediatric kidney disease differ significantly from those seen in adults. Current studies in the areas of genetics, diet and drug toxicity are all aimed at furthering our understanding of the causation and prevention of childhood kidney diseases. This review focuses on 4 areas of the disease process as it affects children. The first of these is the identification and delineation of the most important renal disorders encountered in children.

National surveillance of HIV-1 infection in injecting drug users in the Czech Republic. I. Seroprevalence and clinical status in Prague. A surveillance of HIV-1 seroprevalence and incidence in injecting drug users was conducted in the Czech Republic's three most populous cities (Prague, Brno, and Ostrava). The overall 6-year test- and/or antibody-prevalence was 35.6%. In an analysis by city and gender, the prevalence in males was 37.0% (Brno 25.0%; Prague 36.7%; Ostrava 51.8%). For females the prevalence was 31.3% (Brno 22.9%; Prague 16.5%; Ostrava 60.0%). Highest values of seroprevalence were found in younger and most promiscuous individuals. An annual incidence of less than 3.4% was found. The number of new infections was estimated as 16 per million person-years. An analysis by gender, country of birth, time of the year of sampling, place of sampling, and place of domicile showed no differences. A new pathogenic strain of infectious salmon anaemia virus among farmed Atlantic salmon (Salmo salar) in Scotland. Infectious salmon anaemia virus (ISAV) was first identified in 1969 and reports of clinical outbreaks led to prohibition of fish farming in Scotland for 2 years. Efforts to control the disease have been renewed since 2012 and with the ISA virus now back in the forefront (currently only detected in Canada) we wanted to check the current status. In 2014, 187,062 tons of salmon were produced by Scottish food processors and sent to
