pm had been first network at the service of providing automobile navigation and guide systems for a number of years. software for the devices contained a map database. when the unit was connected to a radio, all of the units were in the same area, and they shared the map database. in 1996, pm was purchased by bmw, and the units were redesigned to offer functions not previously available. they were no longer synchronized by radio, but the maps were stored on a flash memory chip, and the units were no longer limited to displaying the same map when at the same position. a few years later, bmw was purchased by mercedes, and the units were once again redesigned to increase the capabilities. these units no longer relied on radio-synchronized data. the units are the same size, with a flat panel display, and a keyboard and mouse for input. they connect to the vehicle via a port on the steering wheel, and can be run off of a usb cable for a portable solution. in the fall of 2003, bmw sold its automotive group to daimler-chrysler and acquired pm. pm was sold to a new company, navdy, in january 2004. navdy was purchased by tele atlas in january 2010. the units are produced in germany, and are installed in over one million vehicles, with over two million units in circulation worldwide. the benefits of using maps in navigation are numerous: detailed information of the road network. save time and fuel. take the shortest route. avoid traffic jams. use the shortest route for every journey. you can download map files containing navigation data to a mobile phone, tablet or other device, making it more convenient to use than a traditional nav system. read below about the benefits of using map data in the most popular models of audi.
