Why would any thoughtful person choose a profession that's based on the chance of a boss call and say, "You're hired"? Why would anyone spend months or years mastering a skill when they can't see any guarantee of a steady paycheck? Why would they spend years getting a degree in an art subject? Why would I spend the last couple of years of my life in a profession that probably won't generate a significant income if I'm lucky enough to find a job at all? That's why I make a habit of saying to people, "There are three groups of people who should definitely not be making graphics for a living. The first two are students and the last is professionals." I let the statement hang in the air while I wait for someone to start rebutting the first two statements. Usually they do so with an argument about the wrongness of hiring the first group. At that point, I've proven my point. I wouldn't go to school to become an IT support technician. Why would anyone spend years or even months getting an experience in Adobe Illustrator when they can get that for free in many cases, through the wonders of Google? Why would anyone spend much time or money learning anything in Photoshop when they can just copy and paste? I needed to learn Photoshop so I could provide a service to clients (some of whom wanted to do their own advertising when these clients competed for ad space with other businesses). I didn't know I was supposed to get a job when I wanted to learn a skill that will improve my life. I am not talking about only getting a job as a graphic designer or photographer. I'm talking about getting a job because you want to learn something that will improve your skills, improve your life.
