In cellular and wireless communication networks, a key concern is radio interference, i.e., cross-user, cross-cell interference. Wireless communication devices are typically installed in a designated area, such as a home, office or in a small geographic area or in a cell, to provide voice, data and/or other services. In order to achieve a sufficient service coverage and/or roaming area, each cell has its own unique coverage. Moreover, with increasing data traffic and ever-growing numbers of communication devices within a given geographical area, interference from neighboring cell or co-channel cells can quickly become a bottleneck, especially since the more cells (i.e., the number of cells) are utilized to provide an adequate coverage area, the higher the probability that adjacent cells will interfere with each other. However, co-channel or adjacent cells/cells can interfere with each other for a number of reasons. For example, analog and digital communications systems may utilize different but overlapping frequency spectra that may result in interference between cells. In many cases, the interference between cells is caused by a combination of one or more of (i) different channel assignment schemes, such as Frequency Division Multiple Access (FDMA), Orthogonal Frequency Division Multiple Access (OFDMA), and Orthogonal Frequency Division Multiplexing (OFDM), (ii) different power constraints of the respective systems, and (iii) different efficiency of the cell planning tool for locating coverage. In this regard, different channel assignment schemes may result in cross-user or cross-cell interference in cells due to frequency reuse within an assigned spectrum. Under a FDMA scheme, the same frequency band (i.e., frequency channel) is assigned to multiple users, such as users in adjacent cells, and adjacent cells are spaced apart sufficiently to prevent interference among such users. In other words, a carrier from a particular
