There are two things that are important when shooting an image: the lighting correct and the lighting and the scene selection. For some reasons, our minds develop a sudden passion for the third one. This is because we begin to try to have a certain look or a certain scene in a photograph. But when we have to make an exposure, the artist can achieve more powerful by lowering the exposure to remove the background blur or remove the indiscernible objects. I was wondering what would be a good thing for the high-key look. One idea comes immediately to my mind when I think about a photography blog. I know that in this way I would like to add a certain shape to the image, changing the contrast. So, we must begin by covering the bright objects that are in the scene. To achieve this effect, you can use a Lightroom adjustment named Reverse Selection Set. As you can see in the image, I have added this selection to remove the high key background. This will allow me to expose the subject later with a lower exposure. For this adjustment, you can use the right arrow key to move your mouse around until you have the preferred area. I have also created a second selection, which I will use for the white balance. You can use the little arrows to adjust it if necessary. To place the Reverse Selection Set adjustment, choose "select adjustment layer". Now we need to play with the color values and the brightness until we find a result. If you can't find a good result this way, you can use the "magical wand" to draw a selection around the subject and, then, masked to the "Image" layer.

One of the best things about the internet is that you can essentially upload files directly to a file manager like Windows Explorer. Instead of manually uploading documents, Microsoft Paint, and other applications or creating a folder and placing all of the information you want to access, you simply pick them up and upload them to an online file hosting site.
