Some of the issues that Fujifilm X-Trans RAW files are currently experiencing in Lightroom may be resolved in the future. I also think that many people using Lightroom 4.3 will be happy with Lightroom 5, because I haven't noticed an incompatibility with any file types that I regularly use. Adobe will soon offer a Lightroom 6 for Windows and Mac, so I'm sure the final release will be better than this one. The My Fantasy feature is quite cool but still not fully realized yet. I like that it's more structured than some of the more user-selectable options that go into the Puzzles section. If you want to work on a puzzle such as the one where you set up a dinner party for four friends with a time table that includes an hour for your husband to have a nap, you can. You can do more with it than just making a silly story out of it as you did with the one about your baby's first steps. Lightroom supports calendars, so you can have the time schedule as well as the other items recurring on a daily, weekly, or monthly basis. You can create a photo journal, and you can also have your computer do some of the work for you. Some of the steps in the new My Fantasy feature are based on preset options, which is one of the reasons that I don't like it all that much. That's also the reason why I dislike the glossy paper option, though it does have the benefit that it's reasonably customizable. The other reason is that one of the steps used to score the user's photo involves the same actions as the one that scores a photo in the interpolation menu.
