In a nutshell, Adobe needs to innovate and improve its UI based on the way customers use Photoshop today, but also how they may need to use it in the future. The first requirement is to focus on and deliver a single and predictable UI familiar to Photoshop users around the world. To achieve this, we needed to set aside much of Photoshop's legacy undocumented UI and focus attention on modernizing things like the keyboard shortcuts and UI. It just makes sense to deliver the product experience the way people expect to use the product, and that's not how Photoshop was delivered until, well, now. The next step was to step back from Photoshop's UI and focus on its core functionality. What customers need to know, and get accustomed to working with, is that Photoshop is the same, but also that it has a dramatically different set of capabilities than in years past. And to help users make sense of this, we've spent the last few years working with customers to understand how to describe Photoshop's capabilities at a deep enough level to ensure people need only skim the surface to get the most out of it. The second requirement is to enable users to access, manage and control Photoshop the way they need to, not the way it was designed to be. This is about delivering more tools and features directly from the menus, and by leveraging modern UI concepts and digital trends. To this end, we are building Photoshop's UI on modern techniques such as CSS (Cascading Style Sheets). One area where we're taking full advantage of CSS is to help users navigate through the UI controls. We recently introduced two buttons at the top right corner of the UI: pagination and filter. You can use them to page between different pages of controls and to view a list of available filter options. These objects will appear in the tab bar of the UI, which will make it much easier for users to navigate the UI based on their needs.
