Oh, for the days of shiny plastic toys, colorful costumes, and gloopy slime. The last five decades have seen an onslaught of electronic inventions, resulting in almost any scenario you can imagine being re-presented with a new form of interactive entertainment. The focal point of each iteration has changed — it's no longer just about just making something for kids, but also about giving new experiences to kids, and adults too. And for the most part, the technology has only improved, offering more interactivity, and increased opportunities to learn, both on our own and as a group. Here's a look back at some of the sci-fi-inspired toys, games, and toys that have stood the test of time. 1. Spidey's helmet can fit over your head like a weightlifting glove. In 1990, Mattel created a Spider-Man-like toy that could be mounted to your head to simulate the web-slinging abilities of the wall-crawler. It was pretty much perfect. 2. The Dr. Seuss License Plate is one of the most iconic parenting products ever created. Way back in 1990, the gecko and hubcap company introduced a line of car decals featuring the work of Seuss. Over 200,000 units were sold in 1990 alone. The licensing company never cashed in on the popular toy but provided additional free goodies with every purchase. 3. It might be a bit early, but the LeapPad has officially joined the ranks of modern electronics. Released in 2000, the LeapPad is the world's first interactive tablet. It was developed by LeapFrog, makers of the toys. Today, it's the most widely used educational tablet. 4. The Beanie Baby is a fuzzy little critter that has captured the hearts and pocketbooks of generations. Throughout the 1990s and beyond, the multi-
