Unless you have more elements, then you can speed things up a bit by initializing the subarrays to a given list (e.g. all the subarrays with an index number  $i$  starting at 0). You could use constant time operations to do this. You may want to be careful about what you do when element  $X$  exists in more than one subarray. The results are undefined in that case. The above recursion method is guaranteed to be correct. If you want to be absolutely sure that the results are correct, make sure to add a base case, which ensures that the last array is just that. E.g. if (subarrays.length == 0) { ... } A: Here's one approach that should work with a reasonable amount of practice. Add a postfix increment to the for loop and incorporate it into the initial condition of the while loop, so that it's always at index 0 when the for loop changes scope. for (i = 0; i s.
